The Wired Museum: Emerging Technology and Changing Paradigms
Emerging technology in the field of telecommunications—the Internet and related applications—affects the way we receive and transmit information of all kinds. How will these new technologies affect museums' missions, operations, and even definitions, both now and in the near future? With chapters on online networks, digitization of collections, cultural intellectual property, public access, finance, management, and more, experts in the fields of museums and communications offer their analyses of the emerging information technology and the opportunities and challenges these changes present for museums.
